FARM NEWS

Dry Weather Creates Feed Problem

Dry weather in some sections of Appomattox County is creating feed problems.

Dry weather in many sections of Virginia is pointing up the feed problem on livestock farms, says Dr. H. L. Dunton, head of the V. P. I. agronomy department.

But there are some answers to the problem, he says.

Sudan grass or pearl millet can be seeded up to about 10 to 12 weeks before the average date of the first killing frost, and will produce a fair yield if moisture is available from now on. Farmers in southeastern Virginia should seed by August 10, while farmers in the western part of the state should seed by the end of this week if possible. The growth of both sudan and millet slows down in cool weather.

Dr. Dunton says pearl millet is probably more desirable for late seedings since it can be grazed earlier than sudan and is not dangerous when hit by frost. Sudan should not be grazed until it is 18 inches high, and there is danger of prussic acid poisoning when sudan is grazed immediately after frost. Pear lmillet can be grazed at a height of 12 to 18 inches.

If sudan or pearl millet are not needed for pasture or grazing, they can be used for silage or hay. For best quality silage or hay, cut as the first heads appear.

Small grains for use in late fall and early winter also will help ease the feed shortage, Dr. Dunton says.

Farmers are also asking about grazing a cutting of alfalfa during dry weather, Dr. Dunton says it will be all right to do so, if: the alfalfa is not grazed until it is nearly ready to cut for hay; the cattle are not turned on the entire field at one time; and the alfalfa is not grazed continuously. Let cattle graze only as much as they can in about a week and not over 10 days. Preferably, enough cattle should be put on the field to graze the alfalfa down in about 4 days.

What About Hay Conditioners.

The operating conditions of each individual farm, such as acreage and value of hay, weather conditions, terrain, and size of machine should be considered before buying a hay crusher. Farmers who do not grow enough hay to justify buying a crusher might consider buying jointly with one or two neighbors, or doing custom work.

A hay conditioner cracks, partially breaks, or kinks the stems, opening up the moist inner parts of the stems so they will come in direct contact with the air. As a result the stems dry rapidly at almost the same rate as the leaves. This speeds up th haying operation by shortening the field-curing period which decreases weather hazard, helps to conserve the feeding value, retains better color, and in general makes for better hay. More leaves and branch stems are saved because the stems dry before the leaves dry to the shattering point.

Research has shown that crushed hay dries in 1-3 to 1-2 the time required for uncrushed hay. Crushing speeds up drying most if the ground is dry, the crop medium light, and the weather good for drying. When the crop is heavy, drying conditions are poor, or the ground is very damp, crushing has less effect. It seems to do the most good in the early stages of growth when plants are high in moisture.

Several types of hay conditioners are on the market. Some use smooth rolls which crack or crush the entire stem. Others use interlocking corrugated metal rolls which kink or crimp the stems at about 2-inch intervals. Available research data show that results with either type are much the same.

Hay conditioners are made to be used in several ways. One is made in combination with a mower so that the crushing rolls follow directly behind the cutter bar and crush the hay as it is cut. Another type is separate from the mower, but may be operated by the same tractor while mowing. This type crushes the swath of forage cut on the previous trip around the field. Other conditioners are made to be operated by a second tractor following closely behind the tractor operating the mower.

The pressure between the rolls is the main adjustment on conditioners. The pressure should be tight enough to crush the stems but not to squeeze out the plant juices. In operation the roll pressure is usually adjusted high enough to cause the rolls to operate wet, but the excess juice is picked up by other parts of the plant so there is no wringing out of moisture. The rolls are usually adjusted to the type and yield of forage being conditioned.

Rolls operating at high pressure produce more effective crushing; however, they may clog if operated at too great a pressure.

Phenothiazine - Salt Mixtures For Sheep

Tests at the Agricultural Experiment Station at VPI showed no indication at all that lambs found ewe's milk distasteful after the grazing ewes had had access to medicated mixture. Many sheepmen had believed the phenothiazine would have this effect.

In every case, lambs on plain salt showed higher parasite infections than did those on phenothiazine salt mixtures. It is advised to keep phenothiazine mixtures in the proportion of 1 part phenothiazine to 9 parts salt before storing, particularly if the mixture is kept to mid-summer.

In a related test, flavored phenothiazine salt showed that it had no advantage over unflavored phenothiazine salt.

how "small" those ships were to have brought those first 140 men and their supplies! And Captain John Smith was in the brig of one of them on the arrival! 105 men stayed at Jamestown, including one John Robinson, described simply as "gentleman." We went on board the Susan Constant and the Godspeed. Then we toured the various major exhibition halls at the Festival. Mother Brightleaf had to drag me away from the exhibits of personal possessions of Robert E. Lee in The New World Building, in order to rush to the picnic grounds, where our "package deal" called for a wonderful box dinner. A trip to gift and souvenir shops, and by then we were ready to return to The Inn. I estimate that 20,000 people were on the Festival grounds that day. Later we got out our own car and visited the restored Indian Village near the Jamestown area, and saw some excellent Indian relics, as well as some Indians. That evening we attended an Awards banquet and met many old friends of the publishing world.

To "wrap it up" — please try to attend the Jamestown Festival. Allow yourself plenty of time there, else you will miss so much. And, by all means, attend a performance of The Founders. You will come back mighty proud that Edna Gregory is an Appomattox girl!

Small world department: A card from Mrs. S. A. Lawson, of Appomattox, advises that while on the beach at Daytona Beach, Florida, they chanced to meet up with Mr. and Mrs. Harry Gordon Lawson, also of Appomattox, who were in the Sunshine State on their honeymoon. We have since heard that the same two couples later chanced to meet in a restaurant in Jacksonville.

FARMERS GIVEN WITCHWEED WARNING

Here's a further warning to farmers to watch out for witchweed.

Allan W. Kates, associate plant pathologist at VPI, says the parasitic plant has not been found in Virginia, but now is the time of year to look for it.

Witchweed attacks corn, sugarcane, many grasses, certain sedges, and some broadleafed plants. It was found for the first time in the western hemisphere in the Carolinas and now infests more than 100 farms in North Carolina Crop damage depends on the degree of infestation. Corn yields in some infested fields in the Carolinas were complete failures last year. The appearance of witchweed in Virginia could bring serious results, but the sooner any infestations are reported, the sooner they can be checked, Kates says.

Witchweed plants above ground are small and bright green. The leaves are slightly hairy and the upper and lower leaf surfaces look alike. The plants rarely grow more than 8 or 10 inches high. Some may reach a height of 18 inches. The flowers are small and usually brick red or scarlet, although some may be yellowish red, yellowish, or almost white.

Kates asks farmers to notify their county agricultural agents if they find witchweed, or suspect that a plant may be witchweed. Do not move plants suspected of being witchweed. Request an on-the-farm identification from the county agent.

PENALTY'S A PANE

Winterville, Ga.- Six young boys, brought before Clarke County Juvenile Court Judge Olin Price for breaking 125 windows in school buildings of this community, ruled that the young defenders replace every pane of glass knocked out. Their parents will pay for the glass and the putty but the boys will have to do the work.
